Basma al-Sharif (b. 1983 in Kuwait, of Palestinian origin) Lives and works in Berlin.

Basma al-Sharif (b. 1983) is a Palestinian artist working in cinema and installation. She developed her practice nomadically between the Middle East, Europe, and North America and is currently based in Berlin. Her practice looks at cyclical political conflicts and confronts the legacy of colonialism through satirical, immersive, and lyrical works.

She received an MFA from the University of Illinois at Chicago in 2007, was a resident of the Fondazione Antonio Ratti in 2009, and the Pavillon Neuflyze OBC at the Palais de Tokyo in 2014-15. She received a Jury prize at the Sharjah Biennial in 2009, the Visual Arts Grant from the Fundación Botín in 2010, Mophradat's Consortium Commissions in 2018, and is currently a fellow of the Berlin Artistic Research Grant Programme for 2022-2023. Basma al-Sharif is a finalist of the Aware prize in 2024.

Al-Sharif's major exhibitions include: the Hannah Ryggen Triennial (2025), After the end. Cartographies for Another Time, Centre Pompidou Metz (2024), The Place Where I was Condemned to Live at De Appel, Amsterdam (2024), the 5th edition of Kochi-Muziris Biennale (2022), the Ruttenberg Contemporary Photography Series for the Museum of the Art Institute of Chicago, Modern Mondays at MOMA, CCA Glasgow, the Whitney Biennial, Here and Elsewhere at the New Museum, Berlin Documentary Forum, and Manifesta 8. Her films have been screened in the international film festivals of Locarno, Berlin, Mar del Plata, Milan, London, Toronto, New York, Montreal, and Yamagata amongst others. Her first exhibition at Imane Farès, On Love & Other Landscapes, with Yazan Khalili, was held in 2013.

Basma al-Sharif will be part of the Göteborg International Biennial for Contemporary Art in september 2025.

Her monography Semi-Nomadic Dept-Ridden Bedouins was published by Lenz Press in May 2025.

Semi-Nomadic Debt-Ridden Bedouins

Galerie Imane Farès, 2025

I came across the phrase “Semi-Nomadic Debt- Ridden Bedouins” in Zionist propaganda, as a description of Palestinians that was meant to legitimize colonizing our land and ethnically cleansing us. [...] I used those same five words: “Semi-Nomadic Debt-Ridden Bedouins” at the end of a long sentence, superimposed over a series of images, as part of a work I produced while I was a student in Chicago in 2006. Back then, I was obsessed with the idea that the way a story is told is the story itself. This led me to think that I could change the way the story of my people was being told. [...]

Spread across 12 images, Semi-Nomadic Debt-Ridden Bedouin (2006) abstractly recounts the massacre of a young girl's entire family on a beach in Gaza in 2006. Throughout the series, the artist invited viewers to make sense of a story without a clear beginning or end. Over the following two decades, Basma al-Sharif has continued to develop her artistic practice between the United States, Europe, and the Arabic-speaking world — always in orbit around Palestine. She approaches her country of origin from elsewhere, through other narratives, other voices, and at times from within, shifting the struggle beyond its immediate urgency and inscribing it into a broader memory, woven with echoes and resistance. Rather than fixing violence in images, she conveys its breath — a subterranean, intimate violence, marked by loss, silence, and a refusal to yield.

On the occasion of the publication of her first monograph, Basma al-Sharif revisits this initial series and introduces a new collection of images. Titled After Image (2025), it brings together smaller, domestic, and transportable photographs that serve as a starting point for reflecting on the future. Composed from her personal archives and expanded with new photographs, this narrative suite — akin to a travel album — documents the architectures, seas, scents, tastes, and cities that have shaped the artist's life, and reinterprets the myth of the semi-nomadic, debt-ridden Bedouin in the present day.

a Philistine is an installation centered around the reading of a fictional text. The story is broken into three genres: History, Fantasy, and Erotica, and is accompanied by a series of stand-alone image.

This new novella reveals the story of a central character (nicknamed Loza) on a train journey moving backwards in time through history. The book begins in present day Lebanon, travelling through 1935 Palestine and ending in New Kingdom Egypt (16th-11th century B.C.E). Reinventing historical train routes that coincide with the Haifa-Beirut-Tripoli line and Palestine Railways, the story tries to suggest what such a journey would be like today, and invites new readings of the history of the region. Moving beyond exhausted ideas of borders and geographies, the book's story incites new possibilities for Palestinian futures and desires. Hinting at the multiple meanings and geographical etymology of the word 'Philistine', the book weaves together travelogues and science fiction narratives in its first two chapters, as the 'Philistine' encounters mythical creatures and rituals, before climaxing in erotic writing with lush and vivid descriptions that pull her through a series of different rooms, moral questions and confusions. Borders are undone and the various inhabitants of Greater Syria and North Africa intertwine along a train journey that escapes the imminent future and asks questions of the past and present.

Across the two larger galleries, a Philistine is expanded into the space as a plush mise-en-scène reading room inviting the viewer to become part of the work. As the book deals with questions of time, rhythm, imagination and slowness, Basma Al-Sharif invites the viewer to read the book in the space. It can not be removed from the gallery or consumed as an object as such - instead it should be enjoyed in situ, with other works and other people. The book is presented in Vernacular Arabic and English, exploring the nuances of translation, and connections and tensions between and within both languages.

Les Barbares

The installation comprises:

- a projection on photographs
- a neon
- a sound installation, 19 min

Unique

Exhibition view: Panorama 25, 22 September - 13 January, Le Fresnoy

As an extension of the installation a Philistine, Les Barbares invites spectators to sit around a table and listen to the story of a train journey back in time to reveal what has always been there. Following the railroad lines that existed before the creation of the State of Israel, from Lebanon to Egypt via Palestine, the story unfolds as a visceral exploration of borders both geographical and physical. Accompanied by large-scale photography reflecting on colonial archives and voyeurism, Les Barbares is an absurd and provocative celebration of ignorance.

Les Barbares was created when Basma al-Sharif was a visiting professor at Le Fresnoy.

Capital

Two-channel video, sound, loop, and 8 banners (inkjet prints on canvas)

Duration: 19 min. 03 sec.

Edition of 2

Al-Sharif's newest work, Capital—comprising a two-channel video and a series of banners depicting architectural renderings of proposed urban spaces—references Italian White Telephone (Telefoni Bianchi) films of the 1930s and '40s. Named for what was then a scarce status symbol, white telephone films upheld and promoted conservative and nationalistic notions of home, family, and religion. They were later understood as precursors to fascist propaganda films. Often set in foreign or even imaginary countries, the films featured Italian characters in lighthearted, escapist narratives and offered Hollywood-style glamour untouched by class or social conflict—a far cry from daily life in wartime Italy.

Capital was shot at various locations including the CityLife residential complex in Milan, the Nile riverfront in Cairo, residential neighborhoods in Alexandria, and construction sites of new cities—places where architectural histories are romanticized even as they are being erased. Through these sites, al-Sharif explores the desires that drive politicians, urban planners, and their imagined ideal residents as well as how the resulting designs, with their disregard for the historical failures of colonial architecture, seek to transform and control the cultural and political landscape. Together the film and installation hint at the limits of free speech and reveal how the legacies of fascism live on in the present.

A 24/7 neon sign flashes relentlessly on the gallery's vitrine. Reminiscent of Benjamin Franklin's infamous maxim ("time is money") that came to exemplify the spirit of capitalism, it signals a commercial space that is permanently open, accessible at all times. Such is the threshold that welcomes the visitor into Basma Al-Sharif's second solo-exhibition at Galerie Imane Farès.

A fragment of the complex and polysemic project titled 24/7, this sign alludes at once to the normalization of labour time and the increasing pervasiveness of consumerism in both public and private spheres. The neon appears to be emblematic of the uncanny world that the artist has forged : a world in which the banknotes of imperial countries and former colonies are juxtaposed with a photograph showing the veined body of a pregnant woman. A "nonplace" that telescopes entertainment, consumerism, labour, colonialism, the male gaze and maternity and signifies a whole other form of exploited labour.

Through drawings, photographs and light installations, the artist looks at the visual culture of neo-colonialism, which has come to dominate today's globalized world. Each piece calls on the viewer to reflect on the means through which these "isms" have extended their control on us, seeping into even the most confined regions of our private lives.

A Land Without A People (1)-(10)

The slogan "A land without a people for a people without a land" is where this photographic series takes its title. Set in Death Valley National Park, which occupies part of the Mojave Desert and was previously inhabited by a number of Native American cultures over the course of the last 10,000 years, depicts landscapes that play on the idea that a land is never actually empty - even if we don't see it's inhabitants.

The slogan, used in Zionist Propaganda, was meant to suggest that historical Palestine was a viable place for the Jewish homeland as it's inhabitants were a stateless nomadic population - much like the Native Americans - who eventually lost their sovereignty on the land they had dwelled in for centuries. The series depicts such supposedly empty lands, highlighting breathtaking desert views as it moves towards Los Angeles and shows us the Hollywood sign - another hint at a colonizing force in the modern day city: the industry that brought us racist depictions of Native Americans played by white actors that would help recreate the narrative of how the United States came to be the nation it is today and questioning who has the right to settle where, and on what premise.

Ouroboros is a feature length experimental film shot across five locations. The ouroboros is the ancient Egyptian symbol of the snake eating its own tail, a reference to the cycle of destruction and renewal. The film's allegorical story explores this constant process of ending and beginning. It opens with waves breaking off the coast of Gaza and follows a young man through geographically distanced landscapes, as he searches for escape from the emotional pain of heartbreak. Al-Sharif takes a sensory approach to her material, at times reversing film, moving between muffled silences, dialogue and intense melodic sound. We see Gaza at a distance, the images filmed from above by drones, and interior spaces by steady cam, the viewer is positioned in a kind of surveillance role. Unable to visit the blockaded territory at the time, Al-Sharif worked with Media Town in Gaza, a documentary film production and Media Services Provider to remotely direct these scenes with the collaboration of her Palestinian producer Mohanad Yaqubi of Idioms Film. The film builds towards a sort of reunion, one that Al-Sharif has described as only possible through a kind of forgetting and letting go.

This three-channel installation is based on Basma Al-Sharif's first feature film, Ouroboros (2017), which can be described as an homage to the Gaza Strip based on the eternal return. The deconstructed plot unfolds as like a journey, following one man through five different landscapes. The journey marks the end as the beginning, forgetting as the way forward, and the failure of civilization.

Basma Al Sharif's work slips between the fault lines of history to reveal moments, places, and real or fictitious events. Constantly navigating between past and present, she sets out to reconstruct moments from life, to tell stories, imbued or not with real and imaginary memories. A visual writing, with hybrid forms and combinations, emanates from this interplay of incursions between individual and collective memory. The artist plays with the manipulation of images, the use of different techniques, and montage and sound collage so as to create visually strange collisions.

— Mouna Mekouar

Trompe l'œil is an installation that takes over the space of the exhibition to re-establish it as a room in which all the elements that comprise the mise-en-scène are careful disruptions of a scene. Housing the ghosts of an ugly history that finds itself in the present, the work explores the essential function of photography today as archive, as history, and as a representation of the present and a vision for the future.

- What was your intention behind selecting these photographs, and how does their display interrogate issues around access and rights of reproduction? Also, how do ideas around leisure, and even banality, play out within the work?

BA

- I think there's a line between boredom and leisure, and I think that boredom really does produce evil. The work has a lot going on in it but is pared down to a series of gestures I imagine as trompe l'oeils, as tricks of the eye, where we think we see something but aren't quite sure. So I constructed a domestic scene with various kinds of representations, and within it are these Lawrence of Arabia images. Some are made by him, others just under his collection in the Imperial War Museum. The ones I was interested in were those of Arabs with their Arab slaves. It's not evident that's what those images are but I think that's what attracts me to them. The violence that is captured in that single image, which includes the person who has captured the image, are all banalized, domesticated. I think we live with horrors in our every day and we find pleasure regardless — which is both a testament to our survival as human beings and also evidence of our self-destructiveness.

Renée is not a person, Renée is the Renaissance in a cycle of eternal return. Both literary and Cinematic, the installation is the void of the space that the viewer is invited to remove their shoes and enter into a perpetual present. Plush carpeting on the ground is lit by a black and white infrared feed of the space itself, a video loop weaves several landscapes together. A succession of vignettes create the experience of destruction and rebirth that reveal survival as inevitably leading to self-demise. This is a work about the real versus the immaterial, the ruined landscape versus the landscape in ruins, death as rebirth, the end as the beginning.

Filmed in Death Valley California, Matera Italy, Chateau Trohaned Brittany France, and The Gaza Strip.

"This installation is an invitation inside of Renee's room. The only request she has is for you to remove your shoes before entering".

For the installation The Story of Milk and Honey, Basma Al-Sharif initially wanted to write a love story about the Levant, as though it were a classical Arabic song. However, she found herself conflicted by questions of nationalism and orientalism. This work is installed within an environment that is deliberately synthetic; artificially exoticised, the floor is covered with AstroTurf and dotted with pot plants. Al-Sharif's video Milk and Honey tells two stories: one of lost love; the other of the making of the video itself, and its ultimate failure. It tells of collecting materials in Beirut with the ambition of creating a "fictional love story set in the Middle East devoid of political context." Surrounding this are groups of photographs taken surreptitiously of pedestrians walking along the Corniche, the seaside promenade in Beirut.

High Noon

Exhibition view: The Gap Between Us. Solo exhibition at The Mosaic Rooms, 2018. Photograph © Andy Stagg, image courtesy of The Mosaic Rooms.

High Noon, a film accompanied by eight photographic stills, embodies the dissonance of experiencing multiple times and places at once. Colour saturated images of two locations, in Japan and in California, are merged together. Both places lie on the Greenwich meridian, the 19th century system of Greenwich meantime which established an international standard to measure time. Al-Sharif seeks to escape these constrictions, as the camera cuts across time zones in a hypnotic drift, accompanied by a low fi electro soundtrack.

"Primitive savagery meets the brutality of the modern world in Ruggero Deodato's timeless slice of visceral horror".

Cannibal Holocaust is revived deep in the New Hampshire woods where apathy and violence are blurred.

High Noon is the meeting between the Southern Californian landscape with that of the South-Eastern landscape of Onomichi Japan as an experience of the gravitational pull towards the center of the earth, with the knowledge that we are sometimes standing on the world upside down. We briefly glimpse each landscape as a dizzying series of loops that repeat themselves endlessly.

"In O' Persecuted, Al-Sharif offers an occluded view of the restoration of Kassem Hawal's 1974 work of Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine agitprop, Our Small Houses, before launching into a rapid-fire montage of decadent Israeli party photos, set to a pounding gabba soundtrack. Despairing at the contrast between the certainties of the past and those of present, Al-Sharif suggests an effort to shatter the former through the recapitulation of the latter."

Temporarily restricted from travel to the Gaza Strip because of border conflict, I undertook the study and practice of autohypnosis with the purpose of bi-locating into multiple places at once. Paired with field recordings rendered into a binaural beat soundtrack, Deep Sleep is made up of a year's worth of bi-location sessions recorded onto Super8mm film. The result is a movement through the ruins of ancient civilizations as embedded in modern civilization-in-ruins. Deep Sleep draws from the historical avant-garde cinema to produce an invitation to move through a body as a body, to transcend geographical borders in a collective act that discards memory in exchange for a visceral present.

Home Movies Gaza introduces us to the Gaza Strip as a microcosm for the failure of civilization. In an attempt to describe the everyday of a place that struggles for the most basic of human rights, this vid-eo claims a perspective from within the domestic spaces of a territory that is complicated, derelict, and altogether impossible to separate from its political identity.

Farther than the eye can see

In a story whose ending is unknown, the tracing of how events unfold is a journey backwards towards a place that no longer exists. Farther Than the Eye Can See uses the landscape of the Emirates as an indistinct urban space that appears new, uninhabited, and with a vague promise of something better. It also forms the backdrop for the voice of a woman recounting her story of the Nakbah (the mass exodus of Palestinians from Jerusalem in 1948) beginning with the arrival and ending with the departure. What lies ahead is beyond the range of vision as what came before is becoming a faded memory.

Turkish Delight

16mm film transferred to video, colour and sound

Production: Manifesta 8, Region of Murcia

"Footage filmed in the interiors of homes in Amman, Jordan, just after their inhabitants have left, is interwoven frame-by-frame over a looped soundtrack of single words. Shot on super 16mm film and transferred to digital video, installed in a room sealed by mosquito netting with no entrance. The words are my grandmother's, the homes are my relatives', and the work was made was just after a major war in the Gaza Strip. Turkish Delight is a thinly veiled response to the migration of Palestinians to Jordan, to political refugees who settle in the neighboring country waiting for the occupation to end – refugees who never end up leaving. Their domestic space is a prison with invisible walls; for the spectator, Turkish Delight provides some semblance of the banality of their exile."

Long still frames, text, language, and sound are weaved together to unfold the narrative of an anonymous group who fill their time by measuring distance. Innocent measurements transition into po- litical ones, examining how image and sound communicate history.

We Began by Measuring Distance explores an ultimate disenchantment with facts when the visual fails to communicate the tragic.

In an empty room, a slideshow projection of abandoned places plays alongside the narrative of two girls who find themselves on the shores of a pre-apocalyptic paradise. Told through subtitle text that weaves fact and fiction together, the story of a massacre unfolds. When the image and text malfunction and the story is no longer comprehensible, the video wanders away from the room of the slideshow, allowing us to see what is happening elsewhere.
